of the indie persuasion, and even more especially if they're about characters of a certain middle-class means—is the character who boldly proclaims that marriage is an archaic, illogical, and/or meaningless institution. Almost any character who talks in such ham-fisted terms about the outdated bourgeois notion of lifelong commitment is either as insufferable and corny as they sound, or more often, a construct who exists to be disproved by the movie's other made-up characters. It's one of those debates that tends to interest filmmakers (especially of a certain middle-class-or-better means) more so than their audiences.

I Do... Until I Don't very nearly makes this connection itself. Its doomsaying opponent of marriage is, for once, a filmmaker: Vivian (Dolly Wells), a documentarian whose previous effort, the acclaimed sociological study Tween Jungle, sounds hilariously plausible. Vivian is convinced that marriage is—get this—archaic and meaningless, and she proposes that it should be given a
